This file features Truck Drivers, Bus Drivers and Drivers.

Truck Drivers are a constant presence on the nation's highways and interstates. They deliver everything from automobiles to canned food. Firms of all kinds rely on trucks to pick up and deliver goods because no other form of transportation can deliver goods door-to-door. Even though many goods travel at least part of their journey by ship, train or airplane, almost everything is carried by trucks at some point. Some truck drivers are required to have a CDL (Commercial Drivers License). Heavy truck and tractor-trailer drivers operate trucks or vans with a capacity of at least 26,000 pounds Gross Vehicle Weight (GVW). They transport goods including cars, livestock, and other materials in liquid, loose, or packaged form. Many routes are from city to city and cover long distances.

Bus Drivers provide transportation for millions of people, from commuters to school children to vacationers. There are two major kinds of bus drivers. Transit and intercity bus drivers transport people within or across states along routes run within a metropolitan area or county, or on chartered excursions and tours. School Bus Drivers take children to and from schools and related events. Bus Drivers pick up and drop off passengers at bus stops, stations or in the case of students, at regularly scheduled neighborhood locations, all according to strict time schedules. Drivers must operate vehicles safely, sometimes in heavy traffic.

Drivers are those that are not driving a large commercial truck or bus. They transport people or products to their destination. Drivers transport people in limousines, taxis or any hired automobile vehicle. Drivers transport product in delivery trucks or via courier services. Drivers make sure those that hire them get the people or products to their destination.
